

I continued with my passion for Latin and the classics, and got my Ph.D. in classical archaeology from Harvard, where I met my husband, Andrew Ramage. He became a professor at Cornell, and I at Ithaca College, where I taught art history. We both continue to work on the Harvard/Cornell archaeological excavation in Sardis, Turkey, where we have participated for over 50 years. I have written several books on Greek and Roman art, and one on my great-great-aunts, the Cone sisters of Baltimore (written with my mother, Ellen Hirschland). With her, and later with my brother Edward, I have led many art tours to Europe, in which two of our classmates and many Great Neck friends have participated over the years. Andrew and I are both life members of Clare Hall, Cambridge University, and spend every winter in the UK. We have two children who are both professors (of geology, and architecture and structural engineering respectively) and six lovely granddaughters.
